CHAPTER II

It was late in the afternoon when the travellers came at last to the river. The water ran high and brown with the spring rains, and the old ferryman shook his head when he saw them. No boat would cross that day, he said, nor the next, unless the weather turned. They made camp in the lee of the hill and waited, watching the clouds go over.

By morning the rain had stopped. The ferryman, true to his word, was already at the landing, coiling rope, and he waved them down with something like a smile.
